Water stress represents a challenge that goes beyond the environmental realm. Water scarcity directly impacts health and hygiene due to the quality of consumption, as well as nutrition, as food production may decrease and become more expensive. Additionally, it affects livelihoods by reducing land productivity, according to the United Nations (UN).

This situation also has immediate consequences for businesses, whose production processes heavily depend on water. Therefore, more and more companies are setting concrete goals to reduce, reuse, and recycle the vital resource within their operations and business projects.
